Scotland Yard.

In 1829, the British established the first Metropolitan Police Force in London. Two police commissioners, Charles Rowan and Richard Mayne, had the job of organizing this force. They set up an office in an English private house at 4, Whitehall Place and today it is called Scotland Yard.

There are two stories about how Scotland Yard got its name. The first story is that the house used to belong to the kings of Scotland. When the kings, or their ambassadors, were in London, they stayed at the house. There was a courtyard behind the house, and they used this courtyard as a police station. They called it “Scotland”, so the courtyard was called “Scotland Yard”. The second story is that one of the streets behind the house had the words “Scotland Yard” in its name. This is because the area around there belonged to a Scot in the Middle Ages.

Scotland Yard is famous all over the world for its ability to solve many of the crimes that it investigates. Many famous characters from books “worked” at Scotland Yard, like Inspector George Lestrade from the Sherlock Holmes stories by Sir Arthur Conan Doyle and Superintendent Nash from the Miss Marple stories by Agatha Christie.
